Tassili n'Ajjer is a national park in the Sahara desert, located on a vast plateau in southeastern Algeria of roughly 80,000 sq. km. It contains one of the most important collections of prehistoric rock art in the world.

It is an exceptional archaeological site, noted for its numerous prehistoric rock art sites that date to the early Neolithic era during which the Sahara was a habitable savanna rather than the current desert. The earliest art is thought to be about 12,000 years old. Some 15,000 paintings and engravings have been identified and documented, with depictions of large animals including antelopes, cattle, crocodiles and humans. The human figures depict hunting and dancing. There are also geometric designs.

Between 12,000 and 7,000 years ago, the Sahara's climate was far wetter than it is today. Water flowing from the mountainous regions fed the savanna and woodland which housed much wildlife. This in turn attracted hunter-gatherers. Domesticated animals such as cattle, goats and sheep began to appear. So, while hunting and gathering continued, some Saharans adopted a pastoral lifestyle.

By 6,000 years ago, the climate began to change, becoming much drier; Saharan inhabitants and their livestock moved away. By 4,500 years ago the Sahara began to resemble the picture we see today.

The illicit sale of cultural objects stolen from museums or looted from archaeological sites is a growing international problem.

The profits generated by the sale of smuggled objects are used to finance arms deals and the activities of extremist groups, and thus, may ultimately make longer human suffering.

Cultural heritage means important values to be passed on to future generations. Illegal archaeological digging and the removal of artifacts and cultural objects destroy the scientific basis for studying cultural heritage and national identity. Therefore, the impact of such criminal acts extends further than financial loss.

Although countries in all parts of the world may suffer from illegal export and import of cultural objects, countries which have experienced war, crisis or natural disaster are particularly exposed to looting and criminal acts. Current examples include Iraq and Syria, where objects stolen from museums, cultural institutions and archaeological sites are being smuggled abroad for illegal sale in the West and elsewhere.

According to Interpol, illicit trade in artifacts and cultural objects is one of the most common forms of illicit trade, and generates considerable revenues. Illicit trade in cultural objects cannot be considered in isolation, as it is increasingly linked with other criminal activity. Cross-border crime of this type is a global problem that demands the investment of resources and implementation of preventive measures in origin, transit and destination countries. Therefore, to combat illicit trade in cultural objects effectively, the international community needs to coordinate efforts and promote collaboration between different organizations and countries.
