3 Reasons Why Science Fiction is Film's Greatest Genre

Of the many dozens of genres and subgenres in film, science fiction has always been my favorite, ever since I was a boy. To me, science fiction has to be the most imaginative genre. Here are 3 reasons, and there are plenty more, for not only why I love the science fiction genre but why I feel that it's film's best genre.

Science fiction has created societies and political systems as a reflection of us. Often times in science fiction, filmmakers are keen to use the future in order to examine issues that we're going through today. Science-fiction filmmakers create idealistic, peaceful societies or dystopian, tyrannical states as a way to help us deal with our problems right now.

Science fiction has inspired current technology. From Star Trek's communicator inspiring the first cell phones, to Minority Report inspiring gesture-based user interfaces, to Total Recall inspiring driverless cars, we have seen many examples of future technologies in past science-fiction films come to life. Even Star Wars, a mostly fantasy science-fiction saga, has inspired some of today's most innovative technological advancements.

Science fiction can talk about the present without ever being in the present. Science-fiction films have spoken about racism, slavery, colonialism, public health issues, climate change, tyranny, and the effects of war. One of the beauties about science-fiction cinema is that it gives an outlet for filmmakers to talk about sensitive subjects in a way that's indirect.

Overall, science fiction is not only my favorite film genre, but it's the most subversive, most creative, and the most imaginative one due to the endless possibilities the genre brings.
