Long before the rise of the Inca and Aztec Empires, the Mayan civilization flourished in Central America. The Maya first settled in the region as early as 1500 BC, growing maize and living in small agricultural communities. But by about AD 200, these villages were becoming cities. At its height, the Mayan civilization included more than 40 cities, each with a population of 5,000 to 50,000 people. The Maya were never an empire. Although the cities shared the same culture, each city operated independently.

For many centuries, the Maya prospered. They studied the stars and developed sophisticated and accurate calendars; they developed complex hieroglyphic writing that they used to record historical and religious events and they had a mathematical system based on units of 20. Their craftsmen and artists produced fine goods made of cotton, feathers, clay, wood, and precious metals and stones. Moreover, the Mayan cities had huge stone buildings, including palaces, pyramids, and temples.

However, by AD 800, the Mayan civilization was in decline. While the reasons are not fully understood, archaeologists believe that the cities had grown so large, there were not enough farmers left to supply them with food. In addition, the farmland was becoming overused and the soil depleted. Food production diminished, and famine forced people to leave the urban centres.
